earlier period. During Q3 2009, it was down ZZ%; however, "m ore profitable" catering sales were a larger percentage of total food and beverage than they were in Q3 2008.

Corporate holiday spending not a bad word

As detailed above, Corporate Am erica is returning to the skies and to hote ls and events. W hile businesses have yet to begin to hire enough wo rkers to dent the unem ployment rate, m any of them may be seeing enough light at the end of the tunnel.

Whether it's because they are seeing light at the end of the tunnel or perhaps because they cannot ignore the fatigue and frustration in the faces of their recession-weary em ployees—companies are also stepping up their holiday party planning. This is very good news indeed for the catering industry, which saw sales tied to corporate events plummet during 2008 and 2009.

As suggested below, most signs point to a thawing in corporate holiday spending, with the major caveat that while m ore parties m ay be unde rway—and more guests per party—spending per plate remains pressured.

A look back to 2009

According to a December 2009 online poll by Special Events Magazine, two-thirds of respondent caterers say they expected to book less holiday party business that year than they did in 2008. Some ZZ% said they would book more, and another ZZ% said they would book a similar amount. According to Special Events, caterers seeing a drop in busin ess reported revenue declines anywhere from ZZ% to ZZ%.

Most trends were cost-related, with most corporate parties that did occur tending toward the smaller and less lav ish, with m any corpor ate events generally transitioning from elaborate cocktail buffets to stream lined lunch or dinner buffets, and by adapting to cheaper, m ore convenient grab-and-go formats.

2010 holiday catering season better than 2009? Yes!

Thankfully, most industry observers agree that 2010 will not be worse than—or even a repeat of -2009. Cost and budgetary concerns rem ain the overwhelming issues. Caterers report a m ixture of outcomes, such as fewer events but events with more guests; party sizes going up but price per guest going down; and the need to present catering clients with f lexible plans to a llow for less expensive menu substitutions.

Ultimately, success is dependent on those companies either performing well during the recession or coming out of the recession. But even these company need to beware of how throwing a lavish party can be interpreted by their employees, some of whom may s till feel insecu re about their own job status and/or have recently seen a fellow worker cut from the workforce.

Table 6-1: First Child Born in Past 12 Months, Key Demographics, 2010
	First child born in past 12 Months (mils)	% of total first born children

